Excerpt: .In all its bearings the case is one in which we should have expected a High Court of Equity like the House of Lords to have mediated more successfully between the fixed exceptions of law and what the common sense of our age requires. Nothing is more familiar to our generation than the idea of the necessity of evolution in connection with all our institutions. It has become a popular category and is in constant use. Yet this decision, under cover of a legal fiction, flouts it. Although we live in an age when changes of this kind have become evident to everyone and are universally accepted as a law of life and vital growth, yet this high seat of judgment, this ultimate court of appeal pretends not to see them, in fact declares they do not exist. That might do very well for a...
