It has been done and no doubt some survived, but only because green food happened to be accessible, and the chick after eating the poison, found the antidote. A dog can eat Rough on Rats and then drink a pan of milk and suffer no injury, hut that does not justify me in advising it as a steady diet for dogs. Those who prefer the dry grain ration should after the third day use pinhead oat meal and a little millet seed until they can eat cracked wheat, finely chopped corn, and hulled oats, which latter should constitute the main food for a growing chick. Add to this a little millet or chopped sunflower seed with a little (very little) cut green bone or lean meat dally after they are ten days old, the amount depending on the season...
