The time that could be so occupied, by the usage of the Club, was limited; and yet the example set me by the brilliant and distinguished speakers who had already addressed it, as well as the vital importance of the question itself, made an extended preliminary study necessary. I thus found myself in possession, when the time arrived, of considerably more material than could be used for the original purpose, and the present volume is the result. The responsibility for its production my friends of the Club will have to share with me, since it grew out of their invitation. Their willingness to hear me unquestionably arose from a conviction that the sincere, experience-tested conclusions of a thoroughly practical business man my sole title to a hearing are a matter of public interest. That conviction, shared as it is by others of my fellow-citizens, is my best excuse for seeking a larger audience. The address was delivered at a meeting of the Reform Club on the 14th of February, 1890, and forms part of the first, third, and fourth chapters to follow. The third chapter contains also a study of comparative statistics by my brother, bringing out the relation between the countries merchandise export and its import duties.
